APPEARANCE OF ROOMS WHERE ALEXANDER AND DRAGA DIED.

Royal Apartments Torn by Bullets and Soaked in Blood of Victims. A dispatch from Belgrade, Servia, says: The correspondent of the Associated Press was allowed to inspect the palace in which one ever found has recently come into the possession of the Peabody Museum at Harvard. It measures some 31 inches in diameter by 11 inches deep. In appearance, therefore, it is very much like a big, shallow punch bowl. It was discovered not long ago by an archaeological expedition under the foint auspices of the Peabody Museum and the University of California, and is an important part of the instructive spoil The bed room, which is furnished in em pire style, remains in the same condition as when the king and queen fled from it on the approach of the assassins. A simple wardrobe room, leading directly from the bedroom, was the scene of the final act in the drama. The apartment is lofty, but scarcely seven feet wide and fifteen feet long, and is furnished only with three great wardrobes. The officers and were therefore as permanent as any modern stove or oven. The difference was that fire, instead of being built under or against the oven, was brought to it in the shape of heated stones, some of which, still showing evidence of the many heatings to which the ladies are the state of the shape of the state of the s who attended the correspondent showed the latter the blood-stained floor at one end of the room, where the king and queen fell, and the broken venetian shutter at the window through which their bodies were thrown to the ground below.

Escape Impossible. A secret stairway leads through the floor to the southern end of the palace. By this stairway the hapless couple might have attempted to escape, but they were unable to do so because the opening of this stairway was covered by a heavy chest. Escape, in any event, would have been impossible, as the soldiers who had surrounded the palace were so determined to kill the king and queen that they had even placed cannons in front of the palace and were prepared to destroy the building in the event of fail-ing to find their prey. western prairies.

The big salt pan and its smaller companion pieces of aboriginal kitchen and dining room economy were, naturally, not the only evidence of early Indian life found in the old village so long hidden under the plowed furrows of modern agriculture. The excavation, not yet fully completely, has already revealed.

Marks of the Tragedy. Each of the three rooms between the vestibule and the bed chamber showed marks of the tragedy. Mirrors were shattered, pictures were shot through, the furniture was broken, there were bullet holes in the doors and in the oil portraits of the king, which were in every room, and most of the latter were otherwise mutilated.

The appetizing lit-tle anchovy, the delectable sturgeon, hallbut of the largest and car loads of the best salmon in the world are a few of the table delicacies that come from there. Many trout, normal and abnormal, are taken from the pretty lakes that abound. There are seven different species or salmon, the four most important being the quinnant, sockeye (sawquai), cahoe and steelhead. The sockeye, or red salmon, is the most valuable. It is a species weighing from six to ten pounds. The salmon canneries six to ten pounds. The salmon canneries are numerous and flourishing. They give employment to many hands in British Columbia, for the tins in which the fish are packed are manufactured on the spot. Many Indians and Chinese are employed. At one time a considerable quantity of salmon was sent across the continent and to Australia, and even to London, packed in the pinch of depression is felt by all classes. The reason for this state of affairs is not hard to discover. It is the same curse that in a little different but no less fatal form.

The area of the colony is only 7,266 square miles. Of this 2,500 square miles, or one-nor permit settlement or cultivation. They derive a sure, steady and perpetual income by working the mahogany, rosewood, cedar, logwood and other natural products of the forests, and for this reason desire to keep their domains forever a wilderness.

An effort has been made to compel these absentee landlords to sell their holdings at an appraised valuation. However, so overshadowing is their influence that the laws passed for this purpose have proved in-operative. It, therefore, seems probable Centuries Before Christ-Rules of Justice.

From the London Queen.

One of the most remarkable historical monuments that have ever been recovered from the buried cities of the ancient world has recently been brought to light by a French scientific expedition at Susa, in the valley of the Euphrates. The monument itself is a pillar of black diorite, eight feet high, and its value consists in the fact that it bears engraved upon it the earliest known code of laws in the history of the world. It has been photographed, and the inscriptions on it translated, and the whole published by order of the French minister of public instruction. The laws thus brought to our knowledge are so wonderfully wise, and apply so largely to the conditions of life today, that, when reading them, it is hard to believe that they were written over 4,000 years ago, and undoubtedly many of them were made for some considerable time before being codified by the great kinglawgiver, Khammurabi, the ruler of Baby-lonia, who reigned somewhere about B. C. 2200. The code is thus a thousand years older than the Mosaic age, and older than any other known system of ancient legis-

High Position of Women.

But not alone for its age is this code of laws remarkable, nor even for the applicability of many of its provisions to modern usages; it is remarkable as revealing the extraordinarily high position and legal protection then afforded to women. It is an axiom that the higher the civilization of a race the higher is its respect for women. Judging by the regard paid to their women folk by the ancient Babylonians, their state of civilization must have been as, indeed, we know it was, very high indeed. Before, however, giving instances of the legal pro-tection extended by this code to women we should first note three essential features of it which can be easily classified. Firstly, it is based on personal responsibility, and the rule of "a tooth for a tooth," tempered by the law of ransom; next, on the belief in the sanctity of the oath; and, thirdly, on the absolute necessity of written evidence in all legal matters. In passing we may remark that, excepting the first, these principles of legal procedure underlie the law of Great Britain today.

Ancient Trade Drummers.

Although oc-Incidentally this old code throws considerable light on the social and commercial life of the ancient Arab race which ological investigations would have led naturally, to the expectation of finding either a very small group of graves, each then ruled Babylonia. It is strange, for instance, to read that many of the clauses relate to agents or peddlers, the commer-cial travelers of the time. Others related containing one skeleton or several skeleto premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and it is still more curious seven graves were discovered, although this to note that all wine merchants were fenumber represented the burial of several times as many Indians. males. Thus we read that: "If riotous persons assemble in the house of a wine merchant, and those riotous persons she seizes not and drives to the palace, that wine merchant shall be put to death." Though on first sight it might look curious Probable Paralysis When the Panama that riotous persons should be driven to the palace, the anomaly disappears when one remembers that the palace of the king was also the seat of justice and its admin-British Honduras is sometimes called the istration.

The Water Ordeal.

One of the provisions for judgment of this ancient code was the ordeal by water, based on the same principle as that of our own early history. If the person upon trial, on being thrown into the sacred river thinly populated of the habitable regions of the globe, the number of its inhabitants is not only his life, but his property being constantly decreasing; the labor market is confiscated, and generally given to his accuser. If he floated he was adjudged innooverstocked, agricultural industries are de-clining trade and commerce languish and his property. This ordeal by water was also applied in the case of women. For instance, to justify herself from scandal a woman could claim the ordeal of plunging into the holy water. The law on divorce is very explicit, and, from the woman's point of view, remarkably fair and just. For, if divorced without cause, the husband had to allow alimony, the custody of her children and a portion of the estate equal to the inheri-tance of a son; and, moreover, the woman was free to marry again. The woman also was entitled to a divorce, providing she could justify her right to it. Among the causes for divorcing a woman were the charges that she had "acted the fool, and wasted his house." In this case the husband should give her nothing, but, on the contrary, could have such a wife drowned. Sickness, however, was no justification for divorce—"if a man has married a wife, and sickness has se.zed her, he may take a second wife, but the sick wife he shall not put away; in the house she shall dwell; as long as she lives he shall sustain her."

Laws of Property. The laws dealing with property are very full, and based on a most equitable system. One clause is remarkable as much for its common sense and justice as for its resemblance to present-day law, in spite of its remote antiquity. In it we have all the essential features of a modern ward in chancery. Thus we find that in Babylonia a widow with young children could not re marry without the consent of the judge. If she remarried, the judge had power to inher late husband's estate. Such estate was to be kept under deed for the benefit of the children by the first marriage. Not only was the house to be kept in trust for such bought any furniture from the children of the widow shall forfeit his money and re-

The education of a German girl begins at six; it is compulsory, and the rule for attendance is strictly enforced. A mother cannot keep a delicate or alling child at is carried on at the fullest stretch, and the strain on mind and body is such that many a German girl leaves school with her nerves shaken and her health injured for life. Little time is allowed for gymnastics or outdoor games, though some change in this respect is now being made, and at sixthen the girl leaves school, after passing numberless examinations, her studies hav-ing included languages, history, science, mathematics, dancing and singing, a thorough course in cookery and needlework. Marriage is considered as much a sine qua
